

HTML Comments	A tag that is used to insert comments in the source code root folder	The folder that is the highest directory in the file hierarchy. Also called the root directory
HTML attributes	Provides metadata to, or modifies the default function of, an HTML element styles folder	The folder that contains all the CSS code used to style the content of a website meta charset="utf-8"	A Unicode character set that is the default character encoding for HTML5 closing tag	Consists of a left angle bracket (<), a forward slash (/) the name of the element, and a right angle bracket (>) root element	The top-level element of an HTML document scripts folder	The folder that contains all the JavaScript code used to add interactive functionality to a website HTML Tag	Marks the start and end of an element; can either be opening (<) or closing (>) inline elements	Any element that only occupies the space as needed within the area defined by the main element absolute links	A link that points to a location defined by its absolute location on the web title attribute	Specifies the text that will display in a tooltip when hovering over the element anchor links	A type of link that points to a location within the same page relative links	A link that points to a location that occurs in the same directory as the referring page block-level elements	Any element that starts a new line in an HTML document images folder	The folder that contains all the image files class attribute	Used with CSS to style HTML elements with common properties WYSIWYG editor	An acronym for 'what you see is what you get;' what is displayed on the screen using this type of editor is exactly what the finished document will look like.

index.html	The HTML file that contains all of the content (text and images) related to the homepage of a website style attribute	Specifies the CSS style(s) for an element pages visited	An internet analytics term that represents the measure of how many pieces of content (pages) a specific user or group of users views on a single website
World Wide Web Consortium (W3C)	An international organization that maintains Web-related rules and frameworks self-closing tag	A tag that consists of only an opening tag and attributes. This type of tag cannot be used to enclose content; therefore it does not have a closing tag HyperText Markup Language (HTML)	A language that specifies the structure of a webpage bounce rate	An internet marketing term that represents the percentage of website visitors who enter a website and then leave without continuing to view other pages within the same website anchor tag	The HTML code for creating a link to another webpage or a particular section within a webpage src (source) attribute	The URL of the embeddable content opening tag	Consists of a left angle bracket (<), the name of the element, and a right angle bracket (>) alt attribute	The alternative text in case an image can't be displayed hyperlinks	A word, phrase, or image that when clicked, points to a different document or a specific element within a document declaration	Required at the top of all HTML documents, its purpose is to ensure browsers follow the relevant HTML specifications when rendering a webpage
HTML Document	A text document that contains HTML that is read by a Web browser and rendered on the screen. The filename most often ends in the .html extension.
conversion	An internet marketing term that represents the percentage of users who take a desired action
HTML Element	Identifies the role or function of each item on the page. Made up of an opening tag (<), some attributes (if any), enclosed text content, and a closing tag (>) document type declaration (DOCTYPE)	An instruction to a browser that indicates the version of markup language in which a web page is written id attribute	Specifies a unique value for an HTML element. Often used with CSS to style a specific element